Portfolio Comments

The Russian invasion of the Ukraine has been the dominating event impacting markets through February and into March. We have seen intense media coverage of some of the tragic scenes from around the Ukraine and in reaction, Western powers have announced sanctions on Russian banks, Oligarchs and other wealthy individuals. The key economic action has been aimed at the Russian central bank, effectively shutting Russia out of the global financial system, which is unprecedented.

So, what does this mean for markets? Initially this has fuelled some short-term volatility. Starting with the economic impact, we have seen a rise in fuel prices due to the Russian invasion. The knock-on effect of this will likely cause further inflationary pressure on the global economy.

Inflation and the cost-of-living crisis remains a key focus point for markets. In the UK for example, analysts expect a 50% increase in utility bills come springtime. In addition, the BoE expects inflation to remain above their target inflation rate of 2%. It should be noted however, that this is a balancing act as the conflict in Ukraine could further slowdown economic growth. As a result, we expect the trajectory of interest rates in Western markets to remain on an upwards trend.

Turning to growth assets, consumer discretionary equities have been hit the hardest in recent weeks and we have seen announcements from the likes of BP, who are no longer going to hold Russian assets going forward. On the flip side, this has been good news for the utilities sector as these are mostly unaffected by the cost-of-living crisis across the globe.

Looking at market factors – small cap performed the best whilst momentum stocks performed the worst.

Turning to defensive assets, as investors looked to de-risk over the period, bonds strengthened as a whole as UK 10-year gilt yields fell.

In conclusion, whilst there is a lot of short-term uncertainty, the current situation hasn't changed our view on managing investments. Our focus remains on balancing risk and using defensive assets in an attempt to smooth out the client journey. Despite such events being distressing, we believe that it is unlikely to have any long-term impact on investors' returns.
